

Coping with RV Disappointments

I have been joking that I am on my ninth/tenth/eleventh/ twelfth, etc. “going-to-the RV exchange” haircut. But is that even funny? Lately, not so much. I am relatively new to the RV, having purchased my first Dinar a little over two years ago. I discovered several RV gurus, followed them daily, immersed myself in their “knowledge,” and hung on their every word, even seeking out advice. In addition, I was completely ignorant about global finances. (Why would I need to know? Once I was crazy rich, my trust team would take care of everything! Just give me the dates and rates, baby!).

It was so exciting! The RV was always just around the corner. One guru called for it to go every week and still is. If it was a three-day weekend, it was practically guaranteed to go! Popcorn Day was a sure bet! And definitely before Christmas (name the year)! I was always on the verge of being crazy rich! With each prediction, I fantasized about paying my mortgage off, making home repairs, taking my cats to the vet, getting long overdue medical and dental care, buying new tires for my car, etc., etc. And, of course, fantasized about how excited and surprised my friends and family would be when I helped them out with a new car or home. I fine-tuned my humanitarian projects and practiced my presentation. I contemplated what to wear to my appointment, buying a new briefcase, what zip code to use, and whether to drive myself or use Uber. I even wondered about buying smelling salts (probably a good idea!). And then the weeks would come and go, with others telling us: “Just live your life.” “It will happen when it happens.” “God is in control.” Blah, blah blah. Not that that isn’t good advice, but if you are like me, dealing with a business that went under because of Covid, barely living hand-to-mouth, and praying no unexpected expenses or health issues would come up (they both did), that’s probably not what you wanted to hear.

The disappointments were sometimes unbearable. I was upset for myself and even for those I planned to help who knew nothing about the RV. I was especially disappointed for my young friend in Africa who struggles to find work and many nights goes to bed hungry. To give him hope, I told him about the RV early on, and felt horrible each time I had to tell him that the RV didn’t happen. At one point, I became so angry and depressed about the constant disappointments, I asked a friend to send me Xanax so I could sleep and cope with the RV “carrot -on-the-stick.”

One day, I realized that I could not continue living with so much stress or plan my life around the words of self-appointed gurus. I would have to just “live my life” and “trust God.” I also discovered Seeds of Wisdom. I started learning about all that is involved in the very, very complex RV process and why nobody can predict dates or rates. I am not going to lie and say that I wasn’t pretty upset when I discovered that this process could go on a bit longer. I learned the importance of having enough financial knowledge to work as a team with my trust manager, realizing too that the wait was easier when armed with the knowledge of what steps needed to be taken before the floodgate of money was released. How could so many gurus have been so wrong? Didn’t they have excellent sources? Any sources? Did they really believe the intel they were spewing, or did they just want to make a quick buck selling “go-to-RV” packages? Did they all get together and decide what garbage they are going to throw out that week? Why were the gurus so willing to disappoint us week after week with no reasonable explanation? I also wondered why the gurus weren’t educating us about the new financial system. Like the Seeds of Wisdom Team, they could have been taking time to explain things like Basel III and VI compliance, ISO 2022, etc., etc. Instead of wasting my time hanging on the words of those who only dealt misinformation, I could have been learning! Oh well, as Salty say, “Anyway, moving on.”

If my experience resonates with you, I hope you will take some time to learn along with me and read my articles that attempt to breakdown what’s going on the new banking system. And pray the RV goes soon!!

<https://www.seedsofwisdomteam.com/new-world-info>